Previous studies have shown that the use of a single word to refer to a group of people can lead to a more positive attitude towards that group. For example, in a study by Turner and Oakes (1994), participants who were asked to think of a group of people as "a team" showed more positive attitudes towards that group than those who were asked to think of them as "a group". This suggests that the use of a single word to refer to a group of people can lead to a more positive attitude towards that group.
